Random Notes From Washington: Rough Time for Brothers Dulles

U. S. Aides Put Heads Together as Battle Rages, but Day Is Lost to Yales, 42-20 —One by Land and Two by Sea

CPYRGHT

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 18—The brothers Dulles got together yesterday afternoon at Walter Reed Army Hospital, but not for a high-level discussion on the Middle East and Hungary.

The facts are these:

John Foster Dulles, Secretary of State, who is convalescing from a operation, had a special line put in his room from New Haven so he could watch the closed-circuit telecast of the Yale-Princeton game.

He invited his brother, Allen W. Dulles, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency, and both spent the afternoon watching the game.

Apparently neither brother was happy when it was over. Both went to Princeton, which lost, 42—20.

Mr. Dulles left the hospital today and went to Florida for his convalescence.

Planning for a Coincidence

Officials of the State Department say their information now is that there was some joint British-French-Israeli military planning before the Israelis invaded Egypt.

The department has reports that the Israelis got heavy shipments of military equipment from France around the end of August, including Mystère fighters and light tanks.

At the beginning the French apparently had in mind building up the Israelis for a conflict with Egypt alone. But it appears that about Oct. 13 the Israelis and French began talking about possible joint but staggered operations. The British tacitly concurred about Oct. 16, the day Prime Minister Anthony Eden and Foreign Secretary Selwyn Llody visited Paris.

The Israelis invaded the Sinai Peninsula Oct. 29, and the British and French followed with joint action against the Suez Canal area shortly thereafter.
